

Local actions create global change

Jessica Striker, North Dakota State University

Many global mathematical actions are composed of small, local actions. For example, any permutation can be written as a composition of adjacent transpositions. In this talk, we discuss local involutions called toggles, which when composed together in certain ways exhibit intriguing global behavior. We give examples of such actions on order ideals of a partially ordered set and independent sets of a graph.